COPYRIGHT PERMISSION AND RELEASE FORM

Environmental Systems Research Institute, Inc. (Esri), is interested in receiving permission to use your supplied materials including drawings, illustrations, composites, photographs, slides, negatives, transparencies, video, film, videotape, film footage, voice electronic recordings, maps, graphics, screen shots, or other printed and/or digital artwork, text, data, quotes, newspaper articles, press releases, music, and other materials supplied ("Material(s)") and written description(s) for commercial or educational purposes.

Description of Material(s):

Project NOKOGI (New conception of GIS)

The concept of the NOKOGI project was to employ standard ArcGIS technology to really open up the system. Developers weren't bound by the former technology, and they focused on replacing overcomplicated functions with much simpler ones. Using Web AppBuilder for ArcGIS, they created one app that contained various web maps of the utility network, and with AppStudio for ArcGIS, they built a corresponding mobile app. PP determined that, from there, the company's GIS administrators could use these app builders to customize and adjust the tools—as well as build new apps and update old ones—since neither requires any coding. With its underlying HTML5 technology, the PP app can be used in web browsers on various devices. This cultivates a unified user experience among office employees and field workers.
